Ballycurrin Castle, which by all rights should belong to Mr. Lynch, is one of the oldest in freland, having been bullt back in the feudal times when every landlord as compelled to fortify himself against his neighbor. It is a huge structure, built of roughly hewn stone. The walls are practitioners, from state eight feet thick, with numerous recesses in the different rooms where the old lords hid their valuables and papers. From one corner of the building a large square tower rose above the roof and the top formed a partipet with stones set in the Merion style, so prevalent in those times. The roof on the main part of the castle has fallen into decay, but there is a second comented roof that keeps out the rain from the interior of the buildseen of Irish casties.

Everything seemed favorable to Mr. Lynch up to the day of trial. The entire bar of Dublin was interested in the case and about 500 solicitors, barristers and junior counsel were in attendance at the frial. Even on the second day of the proreedings his friends were offering their congratutations on the outcome of the case which they said could not be against him. But on that day the opposition spring a new point on the court and pressed it with vigor. They contended at the line in which Mr. Lynch descended was affected by a marriage settlement made in 1800, which left the estate only in entall and not in fee. Defective vision produces irritation and nervousness, and in this condition no person is capable of giving to business matters or to the ordinary affairs of life the attention necessary to success. Nothing is more important for the preservation of good health and clear business judgment than jealous care of the eyes. Perfect fitting glasses will overcome nature's defects.

The middle aged man of from 35 to 50 without glasses will be the old man without good eyes. Experience is battering down the old erroneous impression that one should postpone the day of glasses just as long as possible. This one mistaken idea is responsible for much of the present day eye trouble.

and venders of poor lenses have done much to harm the eye and bring the science of optics into disrepute. It need scarcely be said to the intelligent person that great care should be exercised in the selection of glasses to sid vision, at once the most delicate and hardest used of all faculties; nature should receive every aid that science has invented to bring the sense of sight to perfection and to preserve it. We give a thorough examination in every detail.

This next week will positively be our last in Wichita for this time. Those contemplating having their eyes' attended to, should call at once, as this is an opportunity that does not present itself every day, and remember that prograstination is the thief of time.
